

USEFUL WEBSITES

United State

<http://www.princetonreview.com/college-education>

Personalizes the college search. You tell the database who you are, how you're doing in school, what's important to you in a college, what you would like to study, how much you can pay, etc, and the engine will generate several suggested colleges. Drawback? It's not completely unbiased. There may be some great selections for you that do not appear in their database.

<http://www.bls.gov/ooh/>

This website contains tens of thousands of careers found in the United States. It provides a thorough description of many aspects of each career and indicates the various educational paths that would qualify a student to practice that career.

<http://apps.collegeboard.com/myroad/navigator.jsp?t=351&i=homepage>

This website requires a log-in. All students will receive their log-in when they get their results from the PSAT/NMSQT. This site contains a personality assessment that is linked to several tools for exploring career options. Allows for personalization according to each student's goals, experiences and test scores.

http://www.advisorsteam.com/temperament_sorter/register.asp?partid=1

This website has a free temperament assessment test that can help students match their temperament to specific job types.

<http://www.actstudent.org/college/>

This website run by the people at the American College Test provides more tips, tricks and advice than you could possibly read in a lifetime. Lots of good information that is organized in a user-friendly way.

www.fafsa.ed.gov

This is the website for applying for federal financial aid in the United States. It will only help you if you are an American citizen or a permanent resident of the United States. Unfortunately, federal aid is not available for foreign students studying in the United States on student visas. However, all American citizens should certainly (must normally) complete the FAFSA before enrolling in university.
